

D's Parent,
MARP Adugodi

While the remote activities ensured the students engagement with arts and learning, it also helped ArtSparks Foundation connect with our students' families. Since the students were working on the activities from their homes, parents/guardians started understanding the work better. They took interest in observing the development that children were showing.

A parent from MARP Adugodi having had an opportunity seeing her child do the activities was filled with joy. She feels her child is privileged studying in this school as not all schools have access to these activities. She sees how the child is staying focused and working now whereas earlier they used to struggle to sit and were easily distracted. She wished her older daughter could have also had ArtSparks Foundation's Creative Learning Lab while she was studying.
